THE USE of mosquito repellent (Skat) at night is one of the steps in the campaign to reduce your chances of getting malaria. If you apply Skat every two hours at night, and use it consistently, you are putting the odds against Annie the Blood-sucker.

SKAT, mosquito boots, mosquito bed nets, screened quarters and other anti-malaria precautions are all designed to baffle the the Anopheles and reduce malaria. The fewer cases we have in camp, the lesser chance there is of catching the bug.

ANNIE lives on blood, and she can't draw her rations through Skat. By keeping the malaria discipline you can starve Annied out of camp.

THE ARMY policy of supplying magazines to soldiers on the basis of soldiers' preferences has drawn some criticism back home, according to ANS. Critics spy a political motive in the Army choices.

THE WAR DEPARTMENT denied it had banned certain magazines from GI distribution, explained that it was making a new list on the basis of surveys of PX sales, Army library reports and other relevant factors. This preference list is in accordance with Army regulations.

CRITICS complained that the Army was interpreting too strictly the section which bars distribution of material containing political argument or propaganda calculated to affect results of the national el-
