LETTERS.

Written upon the occasion of the death of two interesting children, of the Rev. Charles K. Marshall, of Vicksburg, Miss., by their father.

Incaruate loveliness awhile, farewell! Our dearest children, must ye leave me soon?

And ye by your mother's side, together sweetly waked—unmindful of the lavished kiss, set in the death of death.

O shall we never meet in this world. [Tears] See those fair forms, nor hear those sweet, sweet accents?

And the low murmur of the evening tripping feet; And the low murmur of the evening tripping feet;

And this is death! Alas! how changed! How dull, how still, and yet how lovely they seem!

And now the grave hath lost its drapery Of gloom, since a dear portion of ourselves...

Washington! I looked up Pearl street, and saw approaching, with stately tread and open brow, the father of my country.

I forgot till my dying day, the serene, the grand, the God-like expression of the countenance of that Man of Men, his lofty mien and commanding figure, set off to advantage by an elegant dress, consisting of a coat, buff waistcoat, yellow breeches and shoes, buckles, and white ruffs; his powdered locks, and powerful, vigorous look...

SPEECH OF MR. CORBIN, OF OHIO, ON THE "THREE MILL BILL."

(Reported by the "New York Tribune.")

Mr. Corbin rose and said:—I do not pretend to attempt the performance of a task so futile and foolish as to cover the whole field of discussion which this subject embraces, and so much as is occupied by more vigilant leaders...

All that I may hope will be to gather, here and there, a sheaf or two, before the harvest is gathered. I rise, Mr. President, and have solicited the attention of the House for the purpose of performing the humble task of presenting to the body, and through it, if possible, to the particular constituents which I represent, such reasons as I am impelled me to occupy, what every man must know, in times like these, is, to say the least of it, a position not desirable.

But I have been compelled, Mr. President, from conscientious convictions which I have pressed themselves on my mind from the commencement of the present session—from the time I received the President's Message to this hour—to take to view those measures which I deem to be of such importance that they have been presented to the Senate, which separate me not only from the other side of the Senate, with whom those measures have already passed, but also from the other side of the House...

Now, I wish it were in my power to set certain these placid convictions which appear to have settled on the mind of the Senator from Michigan, and which you may mind disturbed, as it has been in common parlance the Senator from South Carolina, by visions and prospects of evil—by fearful apprehensions of a worse step we are now taking may be the last one we may ever take in our career, and in our history as a free people, and I am less inclined to listen to this siren song from Michigan...

And, Mr. President, the Texas, being an independent Republic, had a right to dispose of herself in whatever way and to what end or purpose she pleased, and the particular business of the United States is to complain, would utter no complaint, and his disposition she was about to make of herself. We were told that war with Mexico was not to ensue, if that step should be taken by the people of the United States. We were told then, as we are now, by the Senator from Michigan, that all was yesterday, the sentence which he had said on his tower—that all would be peace, and that that step could in no sense disturb the friendly relations existing between the Republic of Mexico and the Republic of the United States.

which gentlemen indulge with regard to countries with which we have no measures to take which they are strongly urged by feeling or by party attachments.

And is there nothing else, Mr. President, in the history of this year to justify the Senator from South Carolina in his late declaration which will make the other day, in the whole history of his life—comprising the most eventful periods in the history of our country—there had been a time when so much danger was threatened to the interests, happiness and liberties of the people of the United States...

No! He would rather find in the events which led up to the present war, that power of this Government which was evidently intended to be the controlling power—if there may be said to be a controlling power belonging to a Constitution, which so divided out and parcelled out its powers with reference to the supremacy of each in its own sphere—had given itself up to a voluntary slave to that alone, which by the framers of this Constitution had been delegated to the mere Executive and Ministerial officer to the will of the other.

And although this has been the history of the Republic of Texas, but recently a portion of this very Mexico with whom we are now at war. We were told then, sir, that Texas, being an independent Republic, had a right to dispose of herself in whatever way and to what end or purpose she pleased, and the particular business of the United States is to complain, would utter no complaint, and his disposition she was about to make of herself.

Whether they looked to the level dominions of the ancient Asiatic world—where they looked to those feudal institutions of Roman Empire, or to the destruction of the world was parcelled out into a variety of hands—whether they looked to the stern tyrannies of modern Europe, and every one of the hands of the monarch, the despot, the feudal lord, and the limited monarch, had been, in writing down in that instrument, that Congress alone should have the power to declare war, they but consulted in that in fact, as in many other, the gathered wisdom of the Past.

But when I am asked to say that I will prosecute a war, I cannot answer that question, yes or no, until I have determined upon a necessary war, and I cannot determine of a necessary war until I know how my country was involved in it. And it is to that particular point, Mr. President—without reading documents, but upon the general principles of understanding not to be denied on either side of the chamber—that I wish to direct the attention of the American Senate, and so far as may be in my power, to the views and honest constituents whom I represent here.
