with the commencement of serious operations of the siege it began to take, and shortly siter the destructive battle of Inkermann is carriely vanished. Willie the force, feliciency and spirit of the British have steadily declined, the strength of the besieged has steady? increased, from the first opening of the trenches. Therefore, the strength of the besieged has steady? increased, from the first opening of the trenches. Therefore, the strength of the besieged has steady? increased by constant rainforcements, their coursage and spirit has steady rices in the face of danger and death. In the British cause, starvation and disease and suff-ring in every form have run ricity while its behasingsh, betalt and plenty have fostered the atrength and elevated the course, and the whole British preces is loud in its clammars, and vinificiate in its exerctions to discover the cause. As usual where any great clammity overtakes a mation a cappe grace in needed—and Lord Regian is unde to best the blane.

We presume that it is not to be doubted that the unheard of sufferings in the British Army have been principally caused by mismanagement. But it may be dubted whether this is solely to be attributed to the incapacity of the Communic-rin-Chief. The great derangement appears to prevail in the Commisseriat and Quarter Master's department. The misfertures under which the sarray soffers are principally caused by insufficient attention to the comfort and health of the trongs.
