KILLING OF THE TOLLIVERs.

At the town of Montgomery in Rowan county, last Wednesday night, Bad and Jay Tolliver, and Hiram Logan, in the presence of witnesses, were shot and killed, in what was supposed to be a righteous vendetta against the Tollerivers, who had been harassing the county for some time with outrages.

The Tollerivers had committed many crimes, including the murder of several people, and the Logan brothers, two of whom, Bad and Jay, were involved in a personal dispute with the Tollerivers. The two brothers had been on the run for several weeks, and on the night of the killing, they stopped at a saloon to drink and rest before continuing their journey. As they were leaving, the Tollerivers ambushed them, shooting both brothers dead.

Governor Knott, who was informed of the killing, ordered a search for the Tollerivers, who had fled to neighboring states. The search was unsuccessful, and the Tollerivers were never apprehended.

The killing caused a great deal of outrage in the county, and the sheriff, who had been ordered to capture the Tollerivers, was later tried and convicted of murder, but given a light sentence due to lack of evidence.

The killing of the Logan brothers was seen as a just punishment for the Tollerivers, and it was a turning point in the county's history, as it brought an end to the reign of terror caused by the Tollerivers. The county was able to move on from the violence and focus on rebuilding and developing the area.
