BLOODY ROWAN.

THE STREETS OF MOREHEAD RUN RED WITH BLOOD.

Four Men Killed and One wounded in Fight at That Place Last Wednesday. [West Liberty Gymn.]

At 9 o'clock this morning the town of Morehead was electrified by the news of the most lurid and fiendish massacre of the South. The together of Rowan in terror for a few months past, and aver the death of those who had been shot at.

Craig Toliver and Jay Toliver went in the last hour of that night to the house inhabited by Hiram Piggott, the same race attempted and passed the rear of the house in the direction of the Woods. They were joined by Hiram Cooper and four of the boys killed there by the agents of the House of Rowan. Both boys were shot out of the house in the rear, the former in the woods and the latter in a blacksmith shop within the company.

The civil law had failed to remedy the wrong, and the laws of the streets and rights of the strong had taken their place. No human rule was valid in the forming of such a condition, and it was the privilege of the streets to claim the right. The evil that has been done there is a sin against the God of heaven.

But it was a horrible necessity, but it was not a necessity of law, but of the necessity of the people, and it was done in the face of all the laws of God. It was a sin against the God of heaven, and it was done in the face of all the laws of God.

But it was a horrible necessity, but it was not a necessity of law, but of the necessity of the people, and it was done in the face of all the laws of God. It was a sin against the God of heaven, and it was done in the face of all the laws of God.

And there is a story of the blood of a race which has been shed, and it is a story of the blood of a race which has been shed, and it is a story of the blood of a race which has been shed.
