On a bar in the Ohio river at the mouth of Buffalo creek, is a large rock known as "Indian Rock," of an irregular shape, the top showing a tolerably even surface. It is imbeded in the sand and gravel, only about 18 inches of it is above ground. It is 21 feet long, 10 1/2 wide at one end, 8 feet at the middle and 4 feet wide at the other end. When this rock can be seen steamboat navigation on this part of the Ohio, is suspended, or conducted under difficulties. It is probably 200 yards from the river bank. Tradition says that it once laid on the bank of the river, and that George Washington on his passage down the Ohio stopped at this point and cut his name on this rock. The whole face of it was at one time covered with initials, names, &c., and a fellow in years past has looked in vain for the letters "G. W." Many of the marks have been obliterated so that they cannot be understood.
