The Balladry and Folk-Ways Of Kentucky Mountaineers

In "Devil's Ditties" an Interesting Collection of Survivals
From Another World

By PERCY HUTCHISON

The "short writer the judge fished in" for one of his terms on the bench in Morehead, county seat of Rowan County, Ky., happened to be a young woman, Jean Thomas, with a deeper interest in balladry than in court reporting. Or, if she did not come to Morehead with balladry first in mind, her attention was soon aroused by an old fiddler, playing and singing beneath a tree, a group of mountaineers around him. On inquiry she was told that he was none other than Jim L. Hulston, whose songs she was to put to verse for court. The first part of the book gives the mountain setting—lively and faithful word-pictures of mountaineer gatherings at wedding or funeral, or the more intimate duet of courting; the second portion of the volume is a compilation of some three-score songs and ballads, with harmonisation.

The first description is that of the "infare-wedding" (one will note at once the Anglo-Saxon here) of Ephraim and Druilla. There is music and frolic and dancing. And fortunately Granny notices in time that something is amiss, something that bodes the young couple ill if not at once corrected.

"Sang up against the old jam rock were the old woman, a-suckin' her pipe, and all of a sudden, didn't Granny drop her pipe an' turn green? "Him fetch ye leopards and som' awful luck," whispered Granny; "ye daren't git the foot contrary to the cracks o' the floor. Ye got a bound to stand the way the floor-longs is a runmin'\n"

On such things does the future depend in the Kentucky mountains, where young men in tattered jeans and young women in print frocks, the bride with her "waiters," sway and balance and turn to the scraping of the fiddler's bow. The nature of the songs sung as they dance will show at once that the new rhythms and the new steps have not yet ascended the Appalachian slopes.

This will be the first stanza:

There lived an old man by the Northern Sea,

Bow and bend to me.

Then this by the men, the young women replying,

Bow and balance to me.

The girls, however, have not yet advanced, but are still in line, back to the wall. Finally the young men come forward, with

I'll be true to my love if my love'll be true to me.

Eventually the two lines meet, and each swain sings the daseal of his choice, all choring as follows, and all couples fulfilling the demand made.

Now you have one of your own choosing,

If in a hurry, no time for losing; Join your right hands, this blooms step over,

And kiss the lips of your true love.

In the mountains the crowning of tallboys is called singing to "the least un," but one will find under this heading in Jean Thomas's book, "singing" is the great effort to appreciate either the child's taste or his capacity to taste.

The subject of "courtin'" among the mountaineers should, perhaps, be of even greater interest to the antiquarian than any other, for its traditional stanza without a break from the days of the cavaliers and from the troubadours of old Provence. However, pursuing the matter into the Appalachians, it is true, as Miss Thomas sagely admits, that "the mountaineer swain, courtly and gallant though he might be, could not well pour out his love beside a windowless cabin on the mountainside." Instead, then, he sings his love, not so directly to the girl, as to the hills and streams amid which both he and she have their dwelling.

And it is not improbable, as the love-stricken young man pours out his heart to nature, that the bashful maiden will be listening behind some tree or shrub.

Since the collection of these songs has placed it first, it would seem likely that the "Brisk Young Farmer" is, perhaps, the favorite. The piece will not, however, make great appeal to the folklorist, for while there is evidence of an ultimate source in the border ballads, modern corruptions have pretty well obscured the original purity, as will be seen from the first stanza.

I sat down as a brisk young farmer, He is a credit to any man; He courted a fair and handsome maiden, She did dwell in a western town. But somewhat further on come two lines which will reassure the reader of the ballad origin of the mountaineer's madrigal.

He dressed himself in scarlet red, His steers all in green.

A favorite ballad of the love-land is "Barbara Ellen," of which mention will again be made before the close; and songs of a like despairing nature, whether old or new, or part new and part old, fill a considerable part of the lover's repertory.

Court Day and the annual county fair have their appropriate songs and ballads; and in Rowan County the first seems to gain honor from the story of the Tulliver-Martin feud. This is a purely local composition, running to more than twenty verses, by one who "kept good friends" with both sides. It should be of interest to the student of Appalachia especially.

"Funeralizing" is taken so seriously as to marrying, and this is not because death is not regarded with concern; it is because the mountaineer takes everything so seriously that he is capable of little distinction. When "I'm come to die" is the mountaineer's adoration, I'm a-wantin' Brother Jonathan to preach my funeral. He talks so pretty of them that is tuck and makes them as is left behind sorrow for their fineness and the unromancing. And I'm a-wantin' the worst way a fine big funeral occasion. However, he does not forget to add the qualification, "when the time is right."

(Continued on Page 18)
Kentucky Balladry
(Continued from Page 2)

but the quarrel is, perhaps, less with Miss Thomas than with the mountainfolk. It may be that the hills of Rowan County have experienced an influx of "furriners" or have otherwise come under the influence of corrupting outside forces. Such songs as "Canada," "Frog Went a-Courting" and "Sauerkraut." to say nothing of other pieces in this collection, are neither indigenous to the region nor modifications of the noble or affecting ballads brought by mountaineer ancestors from England and Scotland. Of the ancient ballads, "Barbara Ellen" will be recognized at once as "Bonny Barbara Allen"; nor will one be surprised to find the final stanzas brought over from another time-honored favorite. Miss Thomas closes with:

So they buried her in the lower churchyard,
They buried him in the square;
And out of hers grew a red, red rose,
And out of his a brier.

So they grew to the church steeple tops
And there they could grow no higher;
And there they twined in a true lovers' knot,
The rose and the green brier.

More nearly in their original form, and surely more nearly in their proper context, these stanzas will be found in the Child collection as rounding off the tale of "Fair Margaret and Sweet William." Almost in its pristine loveliness is Miss Thomas's "Lord Thomas and Fair Ellen," Professor Child's "Lord Thomas and Fair Annet," one of the finest products of border minstrelsy. We hope that when Jean Thomas goes again into the hills for "short writing" she will find more of the ancient pieces.