THE DESIGN AND EXECUTION OF THE COSTUMES FOR THE EUMENIDES

Donald E. Lillie
Morehead State University, 1977

Director of Thesis: William J. Layne

Statement of Problem

The purpose of this project was to design and supervise the construction of the costumes for the Morehead State University production of Aeschylus' The Eumenides as adapted by William J. Layne. The projected purpose of this video adaptation is for broadcast over the Kentucky Educational Television Network sometime during the school year 1978. Included within this design thesis are scaled flat patterns, and color photographs of watercolor sketches and completed designs for each character. For clarification, a copy of the adaptation has been provided.

Source of Data

Research material came from the following publications:

1. Lucy Barton, Historic Costume for the Stage.
3. Beau Brummell, Male and Female Costume.
4. Thomas Bulfinch, Mythology.
5. William C. Campbell and Steven Ballou, Form and Style: Theses Reports, and Term Papers.
Major Findings

The intent of Chapter One is to provide an introduction, justification and clarification of the project. Included within the chapter is a basic statement of the project, definition of terms, general limitations imposed upon the designer, the methodology and organization used during the project and criteria for evaluating the worth of the completed design. Chapter two encompasses a complete analysis of the design problems presented in Chapter One. These limitations consist of internal factors: mood, atmosphere, locale, period, individual and group delineations; and external factors: those imposed by the production staff, budget and physical capabilities of the facilities used. Chapter three deals with the directions taken by the designer in finding solutions to these design limitations. Chapter four discusses the actual execution of the designs; problems encountered and solutions derived. Chapter five contains evaluations by both the director and technical director of the production. These comments are based upon the established criteria for good costume design. The criteria are:
1. Did the costumes express the atmosphere, spirit, and emotion of the play?

2. Did the costumes express the character's personalities and social positions?

3. Were the costumes functional?

4. Did the costumes retain their qualities when viewed on the television screen?

5. Were the costumes an integral part of the total production?

Appendix I consists of the adaptation of The Eumenides used for this production. Appendix II contains scaled flat patterns used in the construction of the costumes for this project. Appendix III includes photographs of the watercolor sketches and the actual completed costumes as worn by the individual characters.

Conclusions

The costume designs for The Eumenides were successfully incorporated into the overall approach taken by the director. The costumes, using selectivity of realistic elements, met all requirements for effective costume design. The atmosphere, spirit and mood of the play were exemplified by the use of historical draping techniques. Color selection and texture of the garments worn denoted the character's personalities and relationships. The costumes were an integral part of the total production for they enhanced the author's movements and interpretations for the videotaped production of The Eumenides. This fact was further reinforced by the comments of the director/playwright and the technical director.

THE PRIMARY OBJECTIVE OF THE THEATRE IN ITS 2500 YEARS OF EXISTENCE HAS BEEN TO SERVE AS AN AID TO UNDERSTANDING EVENTS OF THE PAST, PRESENT, AND PROJECTED FUTURE. THE THEATRE, AS A MEDIUM FOR EXPRESSION, HAS SUCCESSFULLY SATISFIED THIS OBJECTIVE. THE REASONS ARE APPARENT. THEATRE AS AN ART FORM HAS MAINTAINED THROUGHOUT ITS EXISTENCE THE UNIQUE ABILITY TO ADAPT TO NEW ENVIRONMENTS; TO COMMUNICATE NEW IDEAS AND TO EXPRESS OLD TRADITIONS IN AN ACCEPTABLE STYLE OF THE TIMES. DOWN THROUGH THE AGES PHILOSOPHERS, POETS, AND POLITICIANS HAVE EXPRESSED THEIR SOCIAL, POLITICAL, AND MORAL Viewpoints UNDER THE GUISE OF THEATRICAL ENTERTAINMENT. IN THE PAST 50 YEARS, THEATRE HAS ONCE AGAIN ADAPTED ITSELF TO A NEW MEDIUM OF EXPRESSION, TELEVISION. THROUGH TECHNOLOGICAL ADVANCEMENTS THIS MEDIUM ALLOWS THEATRE TO COMMUNICATE THOUGHTS AND IDEAS TO MILLIONS OF PEOPLE.

DURING THE 1950'S WHEN TELEVISION WAS BECOMING A SUCCESSFUL AUDIO-VISUAL ART FORM, CRITICS FORESAW THE DESTRUCTION OF THEATRE AND ITS CRAFTS; "...A DEGRADATION OF CREATIVE TALENT TO A CANNED, MECHANICAL MEIOCRITY."¹ THIS VIEWPOINT SOON FAULTERED WITH THE BLENDING OF THEATRE'S TIMELESS EXPERIENCE IN COMMUNICATING AND

television's far reaching capabilities for communicating. Robert Wade in Designing for TV cites the vast horizons for the craftsman of this new theatrical form.

"Today in the television industry, hundreds of artists: actors, art directors, scenic designers, draftsmen and visualizers express their individual talents before audiences so vast that an average-sized Broadway theatre would need to present the same attraction - eight performances a week - for nearly a quarter of a century to reach an equal number of home viewers watching a single program. Because of the predominantly visual nature of television broadcasting, a new field with strong and far-reaching potential has emerged for the graphic artist and craftsman - a field in which both can join with the musician and actor to create in millions of living rooms the imagery and glamour of the theatre, the opera, and other "lively arts." 2

The many talented designers who have realized television's potential as a visual form of expression, have had to learn to adapt once again to the physical techniques of a new creative medium. Although their techniques of presentation have changed to meet the demands for television, their aesthetic approaches retain their flexibility and artistic traditions.

The costumer, as one of these visual artists, continues to use established tools that have been at his disposal for centuries. Among these tools are elements of line, shape, color, texture, measure, and position. With these basic tools of composition, the costumer can achieve the desired effect. Using these elements certain functions for good visual expressions must be met. Heffner, Seldon, and Sellman state these basic and established functions as:

2 Ibid., p.15.
1. Be a visual expression of the atmosphere, spirit, and emotional pattern of the play.

2. Express the personality and social position of the character.

3. Retain their qualities when viewed on the television screen.

4. Be an integral part of the overall production.

5. Be functional. ³

1. A costume must "Be a visual expression of the atmosphere, spirit, and emotional pattern of the play." ⁴ The production staff, under the guidance of the director, selects the particular visual form the production will take. The form or approach is termed style. Style is the language the director and his staff use to communicate the specific aesthetic demands required by the particular location, time, atmosphere, and mood of the piece to be presented. To ignore style is to fail to communicate these aspects of production. Historical selectivity in line, silhouette, and distinctive motifs visually depict the spirit and time of the play—thus reinforcing style.

2. A costume must "Express the personality and social position of the character." ⁵ Using style and selectivity, a costumer can visually describe, not only the mood and location of the play, but also specific aspects within the production. A well executed costume design can indicate immediately to the audience a character's age, social and economic position, personality, and to some extent his inner attitudes and emotions towards himself and the other players.

Arrangement of the elements of design create the harmony so vital to a unified production approach. The costumer cannot think only of the individual costume but also its relationship to the other characters in the production. Though the costumer must retain a balanced relationship within the design elements, interest is created by the imaginative use of variation and contrast of the design elements.

3. A costume must "retain its qualities when viewed on the television screen."

Unlike a stage presentation, the television camera has the capability of placing the audience member either at a distance or directly upon the action. The costumer must use good judgement in his selectivity and sensitivity. Street clothing can be employed provided the costumer keeps in mind that clothing is to be worn; a costume is to be presented.

Agnes Young describes the representation of costumes as a "shadowgraph of shape" meaning the silhouette of the costume bears distinguishing traits of a historical period. The costume designer translates this outline into a stage costume. What happens within this contour by way of motif, design, and color depicts the character.

6 Ibid.
7 Agnes Brook Young, Stage Costuming, (New York: The McMillian
This selectivity separates costumes from clothes.

"The costume design with special reference to the stage will be more successful than an imitative reproduction just as a sketch is more successful than a photograph...the photograph records every detail no matter how unimportant or irrelevant. It confuses the mind. A sketch, on the other hand, is stripped of all the unessentials, nothing is left for the eye to deal with but the main facts, and those are so forcibly put that they cannot be overlooked. The sketch may not be as true in a literal sense as the photograph, but it forces the point far better." 8

4. A costume must be "an integral part of the whole." 9 The costume designer, as a member of an artistic collaboration must continually be aware of the other visual elements of production. The director, as the guiding force, brings a unified control to the visual elements. When the costumer functions within this aim for unity, the visual interpretation of the author's intent is satisfied.

5. The final requirement of a costume is that it "must be functional." 10 If a costume hinders the actor or actress in any way, it is useless to him and the overall production. A costume must work with and for the performer. Constriction of movement and function make for a poor design. To be functional, a costume must contribute to the actor's interpretation of a character.

When the requirements of good costuming are met and combined with a tasteful application of the elements of design, the costume will support the conceptual approach to any production.

I. STATEMENT OF THE PROJECT

The purpose of this project was to design and supervise the construction of costumes for the Morehead State University production of Aeschylus' The Eumenides as adapted by William J. Layne. The projected purpose of this video adaptation is for broadcast over the Kentucky Educational Television Network sometime during the school year 1978. Included within this design thesis is scaled flat patterns, color photographs of watercolor sketches and completed designs for each character. For clarification, a copy of the adaptation has been provided.

II. DEFINITION OF TERMS

The following terms are provided for clarification.

Costume Design. The organization of the elements of design into an aesthetic composition which fulfills the requirements of good design.

Flat Patterns. Patterns which are drawn to 1/16" = 1" scale to be used in the construction of each costume.

Watercolor Sketches. A detailed pictorial representation of the completed costume, to be used in the selection of fabric color and texture.

III. LIMITATIONS OF THE PROJECT

There were two categories in which the limitations of this project fell; internal and external. Internal limitations may be defined as all requirements imposed within the confines of the script itself; such as, atmosphere and mood, local and period in which the play is to be presented. The external limitations may be defined as restrictions imposed by the conceptual approach taken by the production staff, the physical facilities used during production and those imposed by the audience itself. These limitations will be discussed individually in chapters two and three.

IV. METHODOLOGY OF THE PROJECT

In fulfilling the requirements for this thesis project the guidelines established by the Morehead State University Theatre Production staff were followed:

1. The script was to be studied and analyzed in great detail.
2. The costumer had to attend all formal and if necessary informal production meetings set up by the director.
3. Ideas related to the directorial concept were to be discussed by the production staff.
4. The design had to be researched by referring to books, magazines, paintings, statues and other related materials on mythology, and television production.
5. Sketches and detailed flat patterns had to be developed for directorial approval.
6. Materials necessary for the construction of the costumes were to be bought or chosen from stock, while maintaining an established budget.
7. The costumer had to oversee or be available during the construction of costumes and latex masks.
8. All dress rehearsals and taping sessions were to be attended.

9. The costumer had to be available for the supervision of repairs on damaged costumes.

10. The post production meeting had to be attended for creative criticism of the finished production.

11. The project report had to be written.

The project report was organized into five chapters and three appendices.

Chapter One. The intent of this chapter is to provide an introduction, justification and clarification of the project.

Chapter Two. This chapter encompasses a complete analysis of the limitations imposed within the design problem. These limitations include (1) internal limitations, i.e., the script itself, and (2) external limitation, i.e., the director, physical facilities and audience.

Chapter Three. This chapter deals with the direction taken by the designer in finding solutions to these design limitations.

Chapter Four. This chapter discusses the actual execution of the designs; the problems encountered and solutions derived throughout the various stages of production.

Chapter Five. This chapter contains evaluations of the design by the costume designer, director/playwright and technical director.
Appendix I. Consists of the adaptation of The Eumenides.

Appendix II. Contains scaled flat patterns used in the construction of the costumes for this project.

Appendix III. Includes photographs of the watercolor sketches and actual completed costumes as worn by the individual characters.

V. CRITERIA FOR INTERPRETATION

Costumes for The Eumenides were designed to fulfill all requirements of good stage costuming as it uniquely applies to the art of television production. The following questions were asked to determine the validity of the above statement.

1. Did the costumes express the atmosphere, spirit, and emotional pattern of the play?

2. Did the costumes express the character's personality and social position?

3. Were the costumes functional?

4. Did the costumes retain their qualities when viewed on the television screen?

5. Were the costumes an integral part of the production?
CHAPTER II
DESIGN PROBLEMS

Unlike the canvas painter, who is free to express what he feels and sees with only the limitations of his canvas and imagination, a theatre artist, such as the costume designer, must work within a variety of limitations. These restrictions imposed upon the designer are grouped into two principle categories; (1) internal limitations, those imposed by the script, and (2) external limitations, those imposed by the director, physical facilities, and the television audience. It is the intent of this chapter to explore these limitations as they uniquely apply to the costumes of The Eumenides.

INTERNAL LIMITATIONS

The primary concern of the costume designer is to satisfy the visual demands dictated by the script. These requirements fall within three general categories; (1) locale, (2) period, and (3) characterization.

Locale of the Play

Ancient Greece is the setting for this adaptation of The Eumenides. The events take place sometime after the fall of Troy. The play spans a period of one day but by using flashback sequences, the director incorporated antecedent events. Six locations were suggested by the playwright:
1. A rock, somewhere along the Grecian countryside.
2. The entrance to Agamemnon's house in Argos, Greece.
3. The chamber of Apollo at Delphi.
4. A dream.
5. Inside Athena's temple at the Acropolis, in Athens.
6. A flashback, Agamemnon's bath house.

Period of the Play

The Eumenides is based on events happening shortly after the fall of Troy, (1200 B.C.). The fall of Troy marked the end of Cretian domination, giving rise to the Archaic Period of Greece. This period has been selected to visually represent the action of The Eumenides.

The Archaic Grecian Period (1200-480 B.C.) germinated the bud from which the height of Grecian culture would flower. During this period of growth, Homer set down his classic tale of the Odyssey and the Iliad, which inspired Aeschylus' timeless trilogy of the house of Atreus. During this time the great gods of Olympian mythology crystalized and the poets Pindar and Shappo wrote their immortal masterpieces.

This vibrance in life was carried over to the Greeks clothing as well. Linens and wools of all textures were vividly dyed in yellows, indigos, greens, dark reds, and purples and an array of earthy colors. These basically unsewn pieces of material for both men and women were draped around the body as a visual expression of the whims of the wearer. To accent the garment a variety of colorful reliefs and motifs were woven, embroidered, or dyed into the garment or along its border. This application could be as subtle and as delicate as a repetitive pattern of rosettes and laurels or as bold and expressive as geometric, human, and animal designs. Intricately carved jewelry of gold adorned the male and female figure. To serve as an accent and visual balance between the costume and the wearer, the jewelry continued into the hair.

Hair styling completed the proportioned Grecian silhouette. The women wore their long hair up, letting tightly curled ringlets fall gracefully to the neck and shoulders, neatly framing the face. The hair was kept in place by either material or ornamented metallic bands. The men wore their hair in tightly curled ringlets or in long natural waves. A full and wavy beard completed the classic look for the Grecian male.

Characterization

Costume design not only has the capabilities of establishing the time and place of the play, but also relates to the audience a visual impression of one character's relationship to himself and other within the play. These individual and group delineations can be shown by complimentary or contrasting treatments of selected design elements, (i.e. line, shape, color, texture, and measure.) For example, Clytemnestra is the mother of Orestes and Electra. The relationship to her children, though weak, is supported by a repetition in silhouette and motif.
Group Delineation

Before the costume designer visually integrated the individual characters into their respective groupings, he first identified these groups. To reinforce the theme of the story, the costumer placed his characters into three groups. The Erinyes, the Olympians, and the House of Atreus.

The Erinyes

Commonly referred to as the Furies, these ancient goddesses sprang from the blood of the murdered Cronus, father of Zeus. With the rise of Zeus and his Olympians to power, the Erinyes became the last of the ancient Titan gods to retain their existence. As long as evil remained on the earth, their powers could not be divested. The sole purpose of these grotesque goddesses of the underworld was to punish crimes beyond man's capabilities. Clytemnestra had called upon them to exercise their power and avenge her death. By their pursuit of her murderer, Orestes, this chorus of darkness would have a final confrontation with the "young" Olympian gods. A strong relationship between the Furies and Clytemnestra had to be visually established by the costumer for they both supported the "old" thoughts on murder and revenge.

The Olympians

These passionate gods gave mankind the gifts of music, strength, and knowledge. Their attitudes were like those of innocent children, using mortal man as a plaything for their amusements, toying and intervening at will to satisfy their vanities. For exemplification, Orestes goes to Delphi to consult the oracles of Apollo. Apollo tells him to avenge his fathers death with death. Orestes does so, cleansed of guilt. Yet, after the deed is done the Furies began to plague Orestes. When he calls upon Apollo for help, he is told that his guilt or innocence must be judged by Athena, Apollo's sister. The costumes for the Olympians had to visually symbolize greatness, innocence, and passion.

The House of Atreus

The tragedy of the house of Atreus began with King Tantalaus, who incurred the wrath of the gods by serving human flesh at a banquet held in their honor. The defiled gods set a curse on him and his descendents. The curse established a slaughterhouse for his progeny despite their innocence or guilt. Steeped in the blood of their heritage, Orestes, Electra, and Clytemnestra bring the curse to full turn. In this case, the costumer had to establish the group as a family and yet reinforce the inner strife that has befallen the house.

Individual Character Delineations

Once the group delineations have been established and defined, the costumer must visually express the essence of the individual's characteristics. These characteristics can be defined as age, social and economic class, personality, and inner attitudes towards himself and those around him. History and legend established the characters' status for The Eumenides.
Apollo.

Apollo was the son of Zeus and brother to Athena. The young and virile god of sun, music, and medicine laid down the truths for all mankind in his oracles at Delphi. Eternal youth and health together with a passion for life make up the personality of this archer god. Childlike exuberance and support of Orestes were the main interest of the costumer. Also to be considered was his relationship to his sister, Athena.

Athena.

Athena, born from the head of Zeus, was also his favorite. The fierce goddess of war, wore the vicious Aegis of Zeus as a symbol of his gifts of strength and power. She was considered the goddess of reason and purity, and protector of civilized life. It was for this reason that Apollo chose her to rule in the case of Orestes' matricide. The costume designer had to show her manlike strength while at the same time accent her godlike beauty. Also to be reflected within the costume was her tie to Apollo and a foreshadowing of her bonds with The Eumenides.

The Nymphs.

These nymphs have been sent to Orestes, by Apollo, in the form of a dream. Their purpose is to serve as a distraction for the harried traveler. However, the escape turns to nightmare as the Erinyes evade the dream. The sole concern of the costumer in regards to the nymphs was for them to appear sensually graceful.
Clytemnestra was the wife of Agamemnon and the queen of Mycenae. Though she loved her husband she could not forgive him for his slaying of their daughter Iphigenia. The queen took a lover and with him conspired in the death of Agamemnon. By this venomous act Clytemnestra sacrificed the love of her children, bringing about her death. In turn, she returned from the dead to seek revenge. Not only did the costumer have to consider physical apparition of Clytemnestra but also visually support her tormented love-hate relationship with her family.

Orestes.

The young Orestes is the last in the line of the House of Atreus. Within him lies the end of the tormented curse of his ancestors. His hatred for his mother the queen is only equaled to the love for his sister Electra. Through Electra he finds the inner strength to end this terrible curse. The strength of Orestes' character, love for Electra and hatred for his mother were the obligations which had to be visually represented by the costume designer.

Electra.

Electra is slightly older than her brother Orestes. She was forced to live a taunted life under Aegisthus' domination. The driving force behind her existence was the hope of Orestes' revenging return. Electra's loyalty to Orestes never faltered even in the face of personal destruction. Not only did her love for Orestes have to be visually reinforced by her costume but the hatred for Clytemnestra and the lover as well.

Agamemnon.

The king of Greece and victorious commander of the army at Troy, Agamemnon returned to his home in Argos knowing full well of his wife's infidelity. Upon his arrival his wife, with the aid of her lover, killed him.

Aegisthus.

Aegisthus, the cousin of Agamemnon, is also the conspiring lover of Clytemnestra. His actions are not based upon his love for Clytemnestra, but rather his lust for the throne of Mycenae. Supporting his loyalty to Clytemnestra in their act of murder was the costumer's main concern in designing Aegisthus' costume.

EXTERNAL LIMITATIONS

Once the script has been interpreted and its requirements satisfied, the costumer must then consider the limitations imposed by the production staff (i.e. the director, set, light, and make-up designers), the facilities used for costume construction, television's mechanical demands and lastly the television audience.

Directorial Limitations

The director, as the overall visualizer of the production, relayed certain requirements to be fulfilled by the costumer. The concept of the Eumenides posed the greatest directorial limitation.
Historically the Erinyes were three women, Tisiphone, Megaera, and Alecto. However, to reinforce a stylistic Greek choral approach to these goddesses, the director swelled their number to 9. Using the choral concept, unity and a lack of individuality had to be conveyed through the costumes of the Erinyes. At the same time, an attempt was made to create uniqueness within the group. In keeping with the historical concept of Greek choruses, the costumer suggested the use of stylized masks to develop the Eumenides as a unified whole. The director rejected this idea because masks would conceal the actors natural expressions. However, he liked the concept of a unified element on "the unclothed portions" of the body.

6 females and 3 males were chosen as chorus members. This further imposed the problem of unity of the costume designer for originally these were to be goddesses of the night.

According to the script, the flashback sequence dealing with the death of Agamemnon called for suggested glimpses of the act. Examples being, a view of the knife going into his chest and his prostrate hand falling into a bloody pool. However, the director saw the scene shot in its entirety to create a visual background for Apollo's rendition of the committed act of violence. This addition necessitated the design and construction of costumes for two extra characters, Agamemnon and Aegisthus.

Set Designer

Since video tape was employed, scenes could be shot out of sequence to be edited together at a later date. Knowledge of the Taping schedule allowed the set designer to take advantage of the editing process and construct his easiest settings first. This obligated the costumer to complete certain character's outfits before others.

Light Designer

Since the light design remained within the stylistic approach suggested by the director, the designer posed no limitations on the costumer.

Makeup Designer

The approach to the play dictated that the makeup had to be an integral part of the overall look of the characters. Therefore the design and execution of the makeup for The Eumenides was assumed by the costume designer. The make up was to be considered outside the scope of this design project report.

Physical Facilities

All construction of the costumes for The Eumenides was to be done by student staff members, volunteers and theatre class students at Morehead State University. When considering the designs for this production the costumer had to be cognizant of this fact and design according to their abilities. Also to be taken into account was the capabilities of the costume shop itself. A budget of $300 and limited fabric selection available imposed further restrictions for the costume designer.
Color selection posed a unique problem for the costume designer. Since television was to be the medium used, he had to be cognizant of the reception differences of home receivers, (Color and black and white). To clarify this point, the reception of colors on a monochrome (black and white) receiver discerns the value of a color not the hue itself. In other words, if swatches of green, red and blue were to have the same brightness of color, on a black and white television set they would all appear to be the same color. The color receiver, of course, distinguishes both color and value.

AUDIENCE LIMITATION

At the time this project thesis for The Eumenides was completed, a projected air date on Kentucky Educational Television during the 1977-78 school year was hoped for. The proposed audience would consist of people capable of viewing a program over the Kentucky Educational Television.
CHAPTER III
SOLUTIONS TO THE DESIGN PROBLEMS

The costumer serves as a creative visualizer using his talents and imagination to find interesting and pleasing solutions to the design limitations. By effectively solving these problems the costumer renders a successful representation of the characters. It is the intent of this chapter to discuss in detail the solutions to the internal limitations imposed by the script and the external limitations imposed by the production staff, physical facilities and audience.

Solutions to Internal Limitations

Historically the events surrounding The Eumenides occurred during the Cretin Period, shortly after the fall of Troy (1200 B.C.). The predominance of nudity during this time created a problem of practicality to the costume designer. The Archaic Period was chosen to visually represent the costumes. Homer, in his tales of the Iliad, illustrated his characters in the Archaic mode further supporting the costumer's period selection. The costumer selected only those elements of dress which would (1) reinforce the tragic mood of the play, and (2) aid in the discernment of group and individual relationships.

Solutions to Group Delineations. The characters in The Eumenides were grouped under three general headings; (1) the Erinyes, (2) the Olympians, Athena, Apollo, and the Nymphs, (3) The House of Atreus, Clytemnestra, Orestes, Electra, Agamemnon, and Aegisthus.
The Erinyes. Rather than adhering to mythological descriptions of the Furies, an attempt to reinforce a visual opposition between the ancient Eumenides and the Olympians was developed. The Erinyes were conceived as ancient eroded statues, weathered by years of neglect, while the Olympians were drawn as polished marble statues, forever young and beautiful. A coarsely textured nylon fabric was selected to translate the Furies grotesque stone-like appearance into a costume. This fabric was dyed a light gray/blue. The similarities in color visually reinforced the Archaic attitudes of hate and revenge shared by the Eumenides and Clytemnestra. Dying time was varied to achieve individual interest in the uniformed costumes of the Furies. The costume folds were then painted with tempera to enhance the desired stone-like quality. As a last step in the development of the costume, they were shredded and girdled. Fragmented latex makeup on the unclothed portions of the body completed the suggestion of decayed statues.

The Olympians. Apollo and Athena's youthful innocence, in contrast to the Eumenides decayed ways, is exemplified by the statue analogy. Draped in shimmering jersey knits they symbolized flawlessly smooth statues. The texture of their clothing further supported an involvement with the House of Atreus. Apollo and Athena's brother-sister relationship was supported by the use of the subdominate color gold and a repetition of bold accessories. The use of similar tightly woven textures also established a bond between the Olympians and members of the house of Atreus.
The nymphs, as emissaries of the gods, wore white to reflect their innocent dreamlike qualities.

The House of Atreus. A repetitive variation of the color red in each member's costume, supported the inherited blood theme of this house. The choice of smoothly textured fabrics for all members further the familial ties, while suggesting a visual relationship with the Olympians. A repetition in style and a key motif served to interrelate Orestes and Electra with their mother, Clytemnestra. Upon the death of their mother, this motif was removed from her costume nullifying her ties to her children while reinforcing her bond to Aegisthus.

Agamemnon was unclothed and bathing at the time of his murder.

Solutions to Individual Character Delineations

Once the general groupings had been established, the costumes were designed to strengthen the individual characters.

Apollo. Apollo's costume was a himation, a simple rectangular piece of fabric made of a polyester knit. The himation was draped diagonally from the left shoulder around the front and back. The right arm and chest was left exposed and the excess material was left to flow freely over the left arm. The rich brilliant burnt orange hue and shiny texture served to reinforce his passion for life and innocent love of mankind. This simple rectangular garment was bordered with a repetitive golden laurel relief stenciled on a cream background. The border was trimmed in a deep blue-green. The use of a motif tied Apollo to the House of Atreus, while the colors in the border established a strong tie to Orestes. His familial relationship to Athena was apparent by the complimentary use of gold accessories.

Athena. Athena's God-like qualities were enforced by a chlamys, stylized pastel blue-green knit cape. The blue-green color further enforced her practical and impersonal involvement in the judgement of mankind. A foreshadowing of the eventual harmony between Athena and the Erinyes was reflected in the similarity in their light blues. A revealing front with open side allowed the material to fall freely into subtle jabots. The back of the garment fastened at the shoulders and fell gracefully to the floor. An extremely short skirt-like loin cloth encircled her lower torso. Its revealing qualities were intended to accentuate her beauty and innocence. The costume failed to do this. The actress cast in the role didn't have the body build to suggest a flawlessly sculpted look of a Greek Goddess. The costumer could have alleviated this problem by redesigning the character to accentuate her natural attributes. The problem was realized too late in production and therefore was never resolved. Along with this adaptation of a warrior's chlamys, her traditional golden aegis and helmet added a dimension of strength and power to her character. To symbolize her wisdom and foresight her mythological symbol, the owl, adorned her helmet.

The Nymphs. The nymphs that appeared in Orestes' dream were clothed in a crepe garment made of two panels connected at the shoulders.
This shortened version of Athena's basic costume served to establish their ties to the Olympians. The front panel of these costumes was girdled to fit loosely to the body, while the back panel flowed freely with each movement.

Clytemnestra. Clytemnestra wore a simply draped shiny blue-gray knit peplos. This was a large rectangular garment which was pinned, back over front, at the shoulders and allowed to flow naturally to the floor. A black crepe chlamys was draped over the left arm and diagonally across the back and chest. The cape was cut to partially reveal her upper arm and hand. Attached to the peplos was a mantle-like garment gathered at an apex between the shoulders and ending at the wrists. The severe diagonal line and cold gray-blue color indicated her vile deeds, while accessories of a golden crown and jewels denoted her station in life. To support her bloody family ties, a red key motif was applied to the border of her chlamys and mantle. The color red served to indicate her ruthless passions and murdering blood bond to Aegisthus.

A second costume was required for Clytemnestra's apparition scenes. To suggest the physical change a gown in similar line and form was built. To achieve a transparent quality, a loosely woven nylon blend was used. The key motif was removed to break her earthly familial ties. Her crown was retained to keep her initial silhouette. The crown was spray painted silver to suggest her ghost like qualities.
Orestes. The layers of clothing worn by Orestes symbolized his immediate involvement in ancestral tragedy. A tan exomis, a shortened version of the peplos, was draped diagonally around his body, being attached at the left shoulder with a golden bulls head broach. A blue-green chlamys also hung diagonally to create a jabot. The diagonal lines suggested a strong sense of conflict in Orestes. A repetitive key motif on a cream background bordered the chlamys, tying him to his family. A thin red trim on the border restated his involvement in the blood theme and the use of the golden broach fore­shadowed his destiny with Apollo.

Electra. The style of Electra's costume was indicative of her family's tragic existence. The key motif on the overdraping of her peach colored peplos further tied her to the House of Atreus. The peplos worn under the overdrape was swept and gathered at the breast creating severe diagonal folds which accentuated her inner conflicts. A tan tunic was worn under the peplos, tying her to Orestes. Her variation of red, though pastel, served to reinforce the bloody theme of the play. The addition of a second chlamys, soft blue in color, revealed the tragedy of Electra's family.

Agamemnon. The illusion of Agamemnon's total nudity was accomplished by exposing his full back to the camera. A strapless athletic supporter was applied for the sake of cast and crew.
Aegisthus. A burgandy himation worn by Aegisthus during the slaying of Agamemnon supported his involvement with the bloody House of Atreus. The color also reflected his affair with Clytemnestra.

Solutions to External Limitations

The problems imposed by production staff, physical facilities, and audience were effectively solved.

Solutions to Directorial Limitations. Solutions to the problems inherent in directorial limitations have been previously discussed in Chapters 3 and 4.

Solutions to Scenic Design Limitations. An arrangement of the costume work schedule allowed sufficient time to complete the appropriate costumes at the appropriate time.

Solutions to Make-up Design Limitations. The nature of the play called for a close coordination of make-up and costume philosophies. The costumer therefore assumed the duties of designing and executing the make-up.

Solutions to Limitations of the Physical Facilities. The construction of the costumes was handled by student staff members, volunteers, and theatre class students. To compensate for the lack of fabric draping experience on the part of the designer and costume crew, the costumes were pinned, cut, and sewn directly on the actors. A lack of local fabric selection necessitated a trip to a Louisville wholesale house, where fabrics were purchased with the specified budget.
Reception differences between color and monochromatic receivers were noted by the costumer. The costumer achieved an interesting visual experience for either type of viewer by using broad contrasts in color and value selection.

Solutions to Audience Limitations. Pending approval of Kentucky Educational Television, The Eumenides will be aired during the 1977-1978 school year. At the time the project was completed an aid date had not been set. Therefore the costumer had to estimate the demographics of a potential audience. Special consideration was given to the audience's possible negative reaction to scenes involving nudity. This potential problem could not be solved by the costumer. The director and costumer assumed the potential audience would be tolerant toward the scenes.
CHAPTER IV
EXECUTION OF THE DESIGNS

Once the designs were completed and approved by the director flat patterns were developed and construction began. It was during this phase of production that complications and minor changes in the costumes occurred.

Pre-Construction of the Costumes.

The shortage of fabric selection in the city of Morehead and surrounding areas necessitated a trip to Louisville. Satisfactory color and texture selections were made for all but two characters, Clytemnestra and Apollo.

The rendering of Clytemnestra's costume called for a pale gray cotton peplos under a dark steel blue knit chlamys and veil. These colors could not be found. A substitution of a pale blue gray jersey was selected for the peplos while a black crepe knit was purchased for the chlamys and veil. The blue-gray and black combination came acceptably close to the rendering and the new smoother textures served to strengthen the costumer's original conception of polished statues.

The problem of fabric selection for Apollo was just the opposite of Clytemnestra. An appropriate color was found, but the texture was dull and lifeless. A rich, glossy burnt orange jersey was substituted to add a shining visual dimension to the sun god.
Construction of Costumes

Once the material was procured and flat patterns developed, construction began on the costumes for The Eumenides. During this time numerous problems were encountered and solutions found.

The majority of problems occurred during the initial phase of production. The most difficult being the interpretation of the design and flat patterns by the costume crew. The costumer wanted the natural draping of the material to accentuate the line of the costume. It was explained by him that textures of fabrics dictate the nature of the folds. A draped velvet will fall into full bodied folds, while a sheer crepe will cling delicately to itself and the wearer. With this in mind the costumer used flat patterns as guidelines for deriving general contours rather than working drawings to be strictly adhered to. Once these basic measurements were translated to the material, it was draped, pinned, cut, and sewn directly on the person portraying the various characters. The flat patterns used in the construction of The Eumenides have been reproduced to one sixteenth inch scale and included in Appendix II of this thesis.

Upon completion of the basic costumes, certain alterations had to be made to visually reflect the personalities of the characters.

The visual picture of The Eumenides was that of weathered stone. The texture of the fabric chosen and the shredding treatment applied to it created an eroded feel but the material still appeared cloth-like. The folds of the garment were painted. By painting these folds, the fabric took on a sculptured appearance without hindering the natural flow of the garment. A tempera/denatured alcohol mixture was attempted, but proved to be inadequate as the paint dusted off when dry. Lacquer was substituted for the alcohol binder and the desired effect was achieved.

In the final scene of the play, Orestes was to be devoured by the Erinyes. Since this scene was to be taped out of sequence, a second costume was built and distressed.

Symbolic golden medallions and headdresses were designed to reinforce the god-like qualities of Apollo and Athena.

While constructing Athena's aegis, the costumer decided that the historical representation was comic in line and failed to denote the fierce quality desired. The piece was redesigned, becoming more lion-like in appearance. Also changed from its original form was Athena's helmet. Lack of construction time and ability to recreate the rendering necessitated that the helmet be altered by the costumer. The helmet was formed by placing strips of celastic on an available mold. By using this mold a more rounded crown was obtained. The helmet still served to support the character because the type, not the shape, was the important element. The substitute was acceptable in the overall silhouette of the costume.

The addition of Aegisthus appearing in a flashback sequence was the next major problem for the costumer and his crew. For the costumer it was a problem of designing an additional character, for the crew it meant building an additional costume. The costumer pulled and dyed a large rectangular piece of fabric to a light burgandy. This material was then draped in himation form.

A problem encountered in construction was the presentation of Orestes and Agamemnon without clothing. To alleviate any potential hazard, an athletic supporter was purchased; the straps were removed and the cup portion was then taped in place.

Upon completion, appropriate trims and ornaments were added and the costumes were stored at the shop until needed for taping.

Problems Encountered During the Taping of The Eumenides

Few problems presented themselves during the taping of The Eumenides. Concealing the wireless lavaliere microphones on the scantily clothed Apollo and Orestes caused the greatest difficulty. The relatively low pick-up range of these mikes made it necessary for them to be in close proximity to the speaker's mouth. The initial placement of Apollo's microphone was in the folds of the chest region. However, the medallion continually clanked against his mike. This problem was solved by placing the microphone in the folds of his garment on his left shoulder.

A major problem was encountered in the costume of Eumenides number one. As previously mentioned, a mixture of tempera and denatured alcohol was used to paint the costume. This paint dusted off with every movement thus obliterating his makeup. A lack of extra material made it impossible to replace the costume. All attempts at sealing this paint failed. To partially resolve the problem Eumenides number one would dress minutes before his scenes and makeup repairs done.
The costumes were adequately maintained throughout rehearsals and performances. Following the final day of taping, the costumes were laundered and placed into storage.
CHAPTER V
EVALUATION OF THE PROJECT

The purpose of this chapter is to determine the success or failure of the project design for The Eumenides. In evaluating the worth of the costumes it is necessary to judge them by the requirements stated in Chapter I. Comments from the director and the technical director for The Eumenides will also be included.

As previously stated, requirements for good costume design are;
(1) must be a visual expression of the atmosphere, spirit, and emotional pattern of the play, (2) must express the personality and social position of the characters, (3) must retain their qualities when viewed on a television screen, (4) must be an integral part of the whole production, and (5) must be functional.

The Costumes Must be a Visual Expression of the Atmosphere, Spirit, and Emotional Pattern of the Play.

The costumer's approach to the design was to visually reinforce the concept of old and new, hate and revenge versus love and compassion. Lustrous textures in rich golds, oranges and blues characterized the youthful element, while drab loosely woven fabrics supported the Archaic lifelessness of the traditionals. The selected use of color and texture helped visually define the tragic line set down by the script.

The Costumes Must Express the Personality and Social Position of the Character.
The costumes effectively served as an outward expression of the inner personalities of the individual characters. The costumer accomplished this by visually communicating an impression of age, status and group relationships as the characters progressed through the play. For example, the torn, coarse, and stone like qualities of the Eumenides' costume depicted their low position in the hierarchy of the gods. The gradations of grayed blues reflected their cold persona and anguished immortality.

Group delineations were also successfully interpreted by the costumes for The Eumenides. To exemplify this, Apollo and Athena's inner personalities were described through their colors, while their familial ties were supported through secondary color and accessories.

The Costumes Must Retain Their Qualities When Viewed on the Television Screen

Subtle textures, bold reliefs, and sharp value contrasts were necessary for the creation of a visually interesting television adaption of The Eumenides.

An adherance to the Archaic Period's personally expressive draping allowed the costumer historical freedom and at the same time fulfilled video requirements. It was this infinitely variable draping that became the key element in the costume designs. From the soft vertical folds of the peplos to the dramatic sweeping diagonal drappings of the chlamys, the tragic statement of The Eumenides was portrayed to the television audience.
The Costumes Must be an Integral Part of the Whole Production

The costumes for The Eumenides fit well within the framework of the director's approach, while accenting the over-all visual picture of the production. The designs were presented in a fashion to represent a period in man's history, while capturing the mood, spirit and relationships of each character involved.

The Costume Must be Functional

All costumes were designed to work with and for the performer; serving as an enhancement to the actors interpretation of the character. For example the loosely fitting peplos allowed the Eumenides the freedom to perform their grotesque ballet movements, while the highly glossed sheen of the Olympian's costume personified their god like qualities.
Dr. William J. Layne, Director/Playwright

Don Lillie's costumes for Morehead State University's production of The Eumenides were totally satisfying. His designs expressed the scope and style of the production, carried through the theme, and illustrated character and situation to the fullest extent as conceived by the director. The designs were executed with meticulous care, therefore making as strong a statement in reality as they did in his sketches.

As director, I felt the atmosphere, spirit and emotion were thoroughly depicted in the production. Color and line were two of the most important elements that created the atmosphere. Apollo would be a good example. The burnt orange color gave a rich warmness suitable to the Sun God. The gold gave him a richness. The diagonal line of the cut and vertical lines of the folds gave the mood and atmosphere of tragedy.

The costumes further expressed the characters personalities and social positions. For example, the Eumenides' costumes depicted their harshness, their age, their worn and delapidated state, their timelessness. Yet a certain dignity was present and a feeling of godliness. Texture created by coarse painted fabrics and raggedness caused by distressing the material created much of the effect. Also the classic line of the garments gave the regal quality that depicted the godliness.

The costumes were basically very functional. This was particularly true of the Olympians and the people of the House of Atreus. The Eumenides were not totally functional. The costumes lent themselves to movement but were extremely uncomfortable. The material was hot when worn for a long time under television lighting. Also, the paint constantly came off on some of the costumes on to everything they touched.

The proof of the effectiveness of the costumes was how well they looked on the television screen. Here is where the designs really proved themselves. The effect was total and most believable. They were completely aesthetically pleasing.

In conclusion, Don Lillie's costumes were a most integral part of the production. They blended well with the other visual elements and did not unduely call attention to themselves. They illustrated character and characters relationships when needed. They placed an appropriate time and local. I felt the costumes to be tastefully conceived and effectively presented. The costume designs were aesthetically desirable.
Rather than answering each of the questions separately, I will comment on the costumes and their effectiveness in the play in general terms. The play is obviously a tragedy. The use of predominantly dark colors and rough textures for the antagonists and lighter, smoother materials for the protagonists was effective in delineating the different roles of the characters. I felt that all of the costumes were effective in their original concept. Only in the case of Athena did the design fail. The problem with Athena was not so much with the costume design but with the casting of a woman that did not fit the concept that the designer had in mind. The fault within the context of this project lies in the fact that the designer did not re-design to fit the person actually cast for the part. In fairness, however, there was a severe time/money limitation placed on him. For the most part the costumes fit the mood and spirit of the play as well as the personalities of the characters.

The Nymphs were a little disappointing in their costumes. The problem here stems mainly from the reluctance of the actresses to appear on camera clad as scantily as the costume designer had intended. The compromise between modesty and concept fell a little too much on the side of modesty and as a result the designs were a bit heavy for the light and dreamy style of the woods scene. Again, the fault lies not so much with the original design as with the limitations placed on the designer by the players' modesty. In a professional situation outside of the considerations of the responsibilities of a university to its students this condition would not have been tolerated.

All costume designs were viewed on the television monitor before the production in the studio and adjustments were made to accommodate the reproduction requirements of the electronic medium. Because of adequate pre-production by the designers and the directors, the potential problems in this area were alleviated. The designs were evaluated for both design and function as determined by the peculiar requirements placed on them by the television medium. Keeping in mind that the designers' background is theatrical in nature, I feel that the overall design concept and the execution of the costumes were of the highest quality available within the limitations placed upon the designer.

The evaluations of the director/playwright and technical director supported the overall success of the costume designs for The Eumenides. The costumes, using selectivity of realistic elements, met all requirements for effective costume design. The atmosphere, spirit and mood of the play was exemplified by the use of historical draping techniques. Color selection and texture of the garments worn denoted the character's personalities and relationships. The costumes were an integral part of the total production for they enhanced the actors movements and interpretation for the video taped production of The Eumenides.

APOLLO: AN OFFICE? YOU? SOUND FORTH YOUR GLORIOUS PRIVILEGE.

CU ON 5TH ERINYES 5TH: (SLOWER) THIS: TO DRIVE MATRICIDES OUT OF THEIR HOUSES.

MS APOLLO APOLLO: (SLOWER) THEN WHAT IF IT BE THE WOMAN AND SHE KILLS HER HUSBAND?

CU ON 5TH ERINYES 5TH: SUCH MURDER WOULD NOT BE THE SHEDDING OF KINDRED BLOOD.

CU ON APOLLO APOLLO: (LOOKS AROUND FROM ONE TO ANOTHER THEN SPEAKS) YOU THEN DISHONOR AND REDUCE TO NOTHING THE PLEDGES OF HERA THE FULFILLER. FOR THE MARRIAGE BED, GRANTED BY FATE TO MAN AND WOMAN IS MIGHTIER THAN AN OATH IF JUSTICE IS ITS GARDIAN. FOR THE ONE CRIME I SEE THAT YOU GREATLY TAKE TO HEART, WHILE IN THE OTHER MATTER YOU ARE UNMOVED TO ACT. I SAY THAT YOUR PURSUIT OF ORESTES IS NOT JUST. IT SHALL BE DIVINE ATHENE WHO WILL JUDGE THESE PLEADINGS OF THIS CASE.

CU 2S CLY. & 1ST ERINYES. CLY.: NATURALLY THE YOUNG OLYMPIAN WILL PREVAIL ON HIS SISTERS AS JUDGE.

OVER OUR VICTIM WE SING THIS SONG, MADDENING THE BRAIN, CARRYING AWAY THE SENSES, DESTROYING THE MIND, A HYMN THAT COMES FROM THE ERINYES, FETTERING THE MIND, SUNG WITHOUT THE LYRE, WITHERING TO MORTALS.

FOR THIS IS THE OFFICE THAT FATE WITH HER PIERCING STROKE HAS ORDAINED THAT I SHOULD HOLD FAST: THAT AFTER MORTALS TO WHOM HAS COME WANTON MURDER OF THEIR OWN, IS SHOULD FOLLOW, UNTIL THEY DESCEND BELOW THE EARTH: AND AFTER DEATH NO WIDE LIBERTY IS THEIRS. OVER OUR VICTIM WE SING THIS SONG, MADDENING THE BRAIN, CARRYING AWAY THE SENSES, DESTROYING THE MIND, A HYMN THAT COMES FROM THE ERINYES, FETTERING THE MIND, SUNG WITHOUT THE LYRE, WITHERING THE MORTALS.

ORESTES: (WITH BLOODY SWORD IN HAND) THE BLOOD YOU SEE IS THAT OF AEGISTHUS, MOTHER, YOUR LOVER AND UNLAWFUL RULER OF THE THRONE.

CLY: (IN TEARS) BELOVED, STRONG AEGISTHUS.

ORESTES: YOU LOVED HIM, THEN? YOU SHALL BE IN THE SAME GRAVE WITH HIM, AND NEVER BE UNFAITHFUL EVEN IN DEATH.

CLY: HOLD, MY SON. OH TAKE PITY, CHILD, BEFORE THIS BREAST WHERE MANY A TIME, A DROWSING BABY, YOU WOULD FEED AND WITH SOFT GUMS SUCKED IN THE MILK THAT MADE YOU STRONG.

ORESTES: WHAT SHALL I DO, ELECTRA? BE SHAMED TO KILL OUR MOTHER?

ELECTRA: WHAT THEN BECOMES THEREAFTER OF APOLLO'S ORACLES? WHAT OF SWORN OATHES? COUNT MEN HATEFUL TO YOU RATHER THAN THE GODS DO WHAT YOU MUST AND DO IT QUICKLY.

ORESTES: YOU SPEAK THE TRUTH. I HAVE NO CHOICE.

CLY: I RAISED YOU WHEN YOU WERE LITTLE. MAY I GROW OLD WITH TWO OF YOU?

ORESTES: I was born of a free father. Your soldier.

CU OF CLY.

CLY: So? Where then is the price that I received for you?

CU OF ORESTES.

ORESTES: I could say. It would be indecent to tell you.

ORESTES: It will be you who kill yourself. It will not be I.

DEFOCUS.

CLY: No, my son, no! Your mother's curse will drag you down. (She screams.)

ORESTES: (Orestes wakes with a start. He half rises from the floor, but is stopped.)

THE HOUR DUE HIM WAS DENIED WHEN HE RETURNED HOME. (STEPS FORWARD AND ADDRESSES ALL.) WITH GREAT APOLLO'S BLESSING, I CAN NOW ADDRESS YOU, VENOMFUL MAIDENS, AND I TELL YOU THAT IT WAS OVER OUR MOTHER, CLYTMENESTRA, THE DARK-HEARTED CONSPIRATOR, THAT INSTRUCTS YOU TO CUT DOWN OUR FATHER. DEVOTED ATHENA, ALTHOUGH THIS HAND DID NOT HOLD THE KNIFE THAT KILLED MY MOTHER, LET IT BE KNOWN THAT THE SIN OF THAT DEED WAS EQUAL TO MY BROTHERS IN MY HEART. (X TO ORESTES) I STAND BESIDE HIM IN THAT GUilty ACT.

APOLLO: JUST ATHENA, I HAVE COME TO TESTIFY.

ATHENA: WORTHY BROTHER, SPEAK.

APOLLO: THIS MAN, BY OBSERVED LAW, CAME TO ME AS SUPPLIANT, AND IT WAS I WHO CLEANED HIM OF THE STAIN OF BLOOD. I HAVE ALSO COME TO HELP HIM IN THIS CASE. I BEAR RESPONSIBILITY FOR HIS MOTHER'S MURDER.

ATHENA: SPEAK ON, APOLLO. WHY WAS THIS BLOOD SHED JUSTIFIED IN YOUR EYES? STATE YOUR CASE.

APOLLO: THEN REFLECT ON THIS. AGAMEMNON, HONORED WITH THE KING'S STAFF GIVEN BY THE HAND OF GOD, ARRIVED HOME FROM HIS CAMPAIGNING. CLYTMENESTRA LAY IN WAIT FOR HIM. AS HE WAS STEPPING FROM THE BATH, AT ITS EDGE SHE CURTAINED HIM WITH A CLOAK, AND IN THE MAZE OF AN EMBROIDERED ROBE ENTANGLED HIM, AND WITH THE AID OF HER LOVER, AEGISTHUS, SHE STRUCK HIM.
