

by S.S. Van Dine

"I don't know." Falloway stammered. "I'm not familiar with such feminine matters. But I think general is wonderful—so mysterious—so exotic—so subtle."

"Your equite right," murmured Vance; and then he focused his gaze on Kenyon Kenting.

"All perfumes smell alike to me, was the man's annoyed assertion; but for Vance could from the question again. "I can't tell one from another—except garland."

"And how about you, Mr. Quaggy?" Vance asked lightly. "If you were giving a lady perfume, what scents would you choose?"

"I haven't been guilty of such foolishness," Quaggy replied. "I stick to flowers. They're easiest. But if I were compelled to present a fair creature with perfume, I'd first find out what she liked."

"Quite a sensible point of view," murmured Vance, rising as if with great effort and turning. "And now, I say, Sergeant, let's have a cursy look at that ladder."

We walked down the front steps and for the second time we went through the street gate leading into the yard.

The short grass was entirely dry, and the ground had completely hardened since the rain two nights ago. Vance again over at the foot of the ladder while Heat held the flashlight.

"There's no need to fear any spilling your adored footprints tonight, Sergeant—the ground is much too hard," Vance straightened up after a moment and moved over to the right, as he had done the previous morning. "And don't get jittery about fingerprints, Sergeant. He went on, 'It might convince you'll find none. This ladder I opine, is merely a stage-prop, as it were, and the person who set it here was clever enough to have used gloves.'"

"He bent over again and inspected it," Vance rose almost immediately. "Not the slightest depression—only a few blades of grass crushed. I say, sergeant, it's your turn to climb."

Heat immediately clambered up five or six rungs and then descended; and Vance again moved the ladder a few inches. Both he and Heat now knelt down and scrutinized the ground.

"Observe," said Vance as he rose to his feet, "that the uprights make a slight depression on the wall, even with the weight of only one person pressing upon the ladder. Let's go inside again and dispense our adjectives."

On re-entering the house Vance immediately joined Kenting at the entrance to the drawing room and announced to him, as well as to the others inside, that they were going and that the house would be taken over very shortly by the police.

"I might as well be going along myself," said Kenting despondently. "Oh, quite, returned Vance," without looking at the man. "Go home, by all means."

The man seemed grateful. Taking his hat from the hall bench, he hurried out the front door. Quaggy's eyes followed the departing man.

"I guess I'll be getting along too," he said finally. "I'll have a note of interrogation in his voice. 'I may go I suppose?' There was a suggestion of snoring belligerence in his tone."

He listened for a moment; then laying down the receiver, turned suddenly in our direction.

"It's a call for Sergeant Heath," he announced. "The Sergeant went quickly to the telephone and put the receiver to his ear."

"Well, what is it?" he started belligerently. "Sure it's the Sergeant—shoot? Well, for the love of—Hold it a minute. He clapped his hand over the mouthpiece and swung about quickly."

"Where'll he be in half an hour, 'Well, it's at Mr. Vance's apartment." The Sergeant turned back to the instrument.

"Listen, you," he fairly bawled. "I'm at Mr. Vance's apartment in East 38th Street. Know where it is? That's right—and make it snappy." He banged down the receiver.

"Important, is it, Sergeant?" asked Markham. "I'll tell you 'is'." Heath stopped quickly away from the telephone table. "Let's get going, sir. I'll tell you about it on the way down. Spink's meeting us at Mr. Vance's apartment."

"As for Markham and Heath and I turned to follow Vance, there came, from some one over at the foot of the ladder and ominous rattle that sounded like the staccato and rapid spluttering of a machine-gun."

"There's no need to fear any spilling your adored footprints tonight, Sergeant—the ground is much too hard," Vance straightened up after a moment and moved over to the right, as he had done the previous morning. "And don't get jittery about fingerprints, Sergeant. He went on, 'It might convince you'll find none. This ladder I opine, is merely a stage-prop, as it were, and the person who set it here was clever enough to have used gloves.'"

"He bent over again and inspected it," Vance rose almost immediately. "Not the slightest depression—only a few blades of grass crushed. I say, sergeant, it's your turn to climb."

The man seemed grateful. Taking his hat from the hall bench, he hurried out the front door. Quaggy's eyes followed the departing man.

"I guess I'll be getting along too," he said finally. "I'll have a note of interrogation in his voice. 'I may go I suppose?' There was a suggestion of snoring belligerence in his tone."

He listened for a moment; then laying down the receiver, turned suddenly in our direction.

"did you, by any chance, note what type of car it was that attacked Mr. Fleel?"

"No, I didn't get a very good look at it," Quaggy returned in a chilly tone. "And he color?" prompted Vance. "It was a dingy, nondescript color."

Heat was watching Quaggy shrewdly. "Yeah?" he said skeptically. "Which way did it go?"

"I really didn't notice. I caught only a glimpse of it as it started toward the park."

"A fine bunch of spectators," Heat exclaimed. "I'll see about that car myself." And he started running toward Central Park West.

As he neared the corner, a burly figure in uniform hurried suddenly into 86th street from the south, and almost collided with the Sergeant. By the bright corner light, Fleel could see that the newcomer was McLaughlin.

"What was it, Sergeant?" His breathless excited query carried down to us. "I heard the shots, and been trying to locate them. Did they come out this street?"

"They damn sure to," McLaughlin replied. "I'm sure. I'm sure," replied Heath, said, grasping the officer by the arm, he swung him about and the two started off.

"My word, such energy!" sighed Vance when Heath and the officer were out of sight. "The coupe could be at 110th Street by this time—and this mad search would end. Heath is all action and no meditation. Sad, sir. What ingredient of the police routine, I imagine—eh, what, Markham?"

"Then he turned to Fleel. 'Feeling better?' he asked pleasantly. "I'm all right now," the lawyer returned, taking a wobbly step or two forward.

"That's really," Vance said consolingly. "Do you want an escort home?"

"No thanks," said Fleel in a voice that was still dazed. "I'll make it all right." The turned shakily toward Central Park West. "I'll pick up a taxi."

"Queer episode," commented Vance, as if to himself. "Fits in rather nicely, though. Lucky for your lawyer friend, Markham, that the gentleman in the green coupe wasn't a better shot. Ah, well, we might as well toddle to the corner and await the emergency Sergeant. Really a good show, Markham, there's no use gazing at the lamp post any longer."

EDGAR ALLAN POE The Poet Who Married a Child and Got Ten Dollars for Ten Years Work

Edgar Allan Poe was one of the most striking and romantic geniuses that ever wrote a sonnet or finished a mystery. He was destined to strike a melancholy giant across the pages of American literature.

Poe was left an orphan early in life, and adopted by a rich tobacco merchant. Finally, even this merchant turned against his adopted son, beat him with a cane, drove him out of the house, dis-herited him, and refused to leave him a dollar in his will.

The story of Poe's marriage is one of the most hauntingly beautiful in literature. He married his first cousin, Virginia Clemm. He had no money at the time, and she was twice as old as his young wife. He was twenty-six and she was thirteen.

According to all the old biographies, his marriage should have been sent to Potter's field. But it didn't. It was a romantic affair. Poe all but worshipped his child-wife, and she loved him as if he were her father.

"I'm all right now," the lawyer returned, taking a wobbly step or two forward. "That's really," Vance said consolingly. "Do you want an escort home?"

Cozy To Show Yellow Jack

Virginia Bruce calls a fine sense of humor the most essential success in Hollywood. The heroine of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's "Yellow Jack" declares the faculty not only aids one in keeping one's balance in the land of glamour, but is calculated to advance one's career post-eritum as it goes with talent and personality.

"As a matter of fact," she thinks, "a sense of humor is one of the finest gifts in any human being. I find it is a distinguishing part of my philosophy on this point in Robert Montgomery, with whom I have been associated throughout, the making of 'Yellow Jack.' No one in Screenland surpasses him in possession of an abundance of this sense, and with it, in him, there go all the elements of success as actor, as friend, as citizen."

Robert Montgomery, screen star, describes himself as roving reporter for his own characterizations. "For that reason, he makes it a point to know as many people as possible, to talk to everyone he meets."

"In order to give a capable characterization," he said, "you have to know something about the people whom you are impersonating. The only way to find out about them is to inquire and study."

Montgomery talks to everyone. Gas station attendants, dowagers, clerks, reporters, stenographers and mechanics are all called upon to add to his story of knowledge.

Wide-spread Praise follows adoption of Code of Practice by members of Brewers Foundation

THE PUBLIC'S response to the adoption of a Code of Practice by the members of the Brewers Foundation was prompt and favorable.

Newspapers, social service groups and thousands of individuals expressed great satisfaction with the brewers' determination to conduct their business in accord with the demands and conscience of the American public.

The Code pledges the brewers publicly to "support the duly constituted authorities in the administration of anti-social conditions wherever they may surround the sale of beer to the consumer."

How far we can go, and how soon, depends very much on ourselves... but partly also on you.

Public opinion once aroused, can exist to bring about honest enforcement of existing laws. Restriction of your patronage only to legal, respectable retail outlets can and will operate to raise retailing standards.

Public preference for the products of Foundation members, identified by the symbol reproduced below, will help members to cooperating retailers, and will encourage them to renewed efforts.
