Jackson's Purchase (taken from Twyman's City Directory of Paducah, 1866)

In 1815 all that portion of Kentucky, W. and N. of the Tenn. River was occupied by Indians as a hunting ground. In 1816 Gen. Andrew Jackson was commissioned by the Federal Government to treat with the Indians for the sale and evacuation of the Territory, in which he was successful. And in 1818 the Indians having vacated the lands, the district was added to Kentucky, and organized into one county, called Calloway, with the county seat at old Wadsworth. Col. Wm. Curd was the first Circuit Court Clerk, in what was then known and is still called "Jackson's Purchase."

When the Chickasaws ceded their lands to the United States through the Jackson Purchase, white men gained control of that territory between the Tennessee river and the great Mississippi, east and west, stretching from the Ohio River to the northern boundary of the state of Miss. This deal, effected in 1818, embraced what is usually known as W. Ky. and W. Tenn., including 8 counties in Ky. and 20 in Tenn. The Jackson Purchase as it relates to Ky., includes Ballard, Calloway, Fulton, Graves, Hickman, McCracken and Marshall counties, approximately 2,100 square miles. A total of 6,000 square miles were in Tenn., while the whole territory involved made 8,100 square miles. By sale of the land, the Chickasaws relinquished all title and claims to the United States of America.

Among the Paducah Indians occupying the Purchase territory in Western Ky. there was one influential, dominant character. That distinctive personality was Chief Paduke--tall and massive, of perfect physique and generous spirit--an altogether unique and extraordinary individuality to come from a nomadic tribe. His favorite expeditionary sites included the banks of Clark's river near where it flows into the Tennessee. Even now the hillsides in the vicinity give evidence of the Indian deer chase, an arrowhead or tomahawk occasionally being found. The finding of Indian relics in other parts of McCracken Co. point the spots the Paducahs chose especially to roam, while several places within the corporate limits of Paducah reveal evidences of the red man's wandering. Gooseneck Hill, a few hundred feet south from the foot of S. 10th. St., across the hollow was an elevation preferred above all others save the grove where Chief Paduke's tent stood, owing to its strategic location and commanding outlook. Whether the Indians under their tribal head built the narrow neck which originally connected the hill proper with the western level of the ground is not known. Until about 25 years ago when boys carried many relics from its crest, the hill was a treasure house of Indian memorials. The stem of Gooseneck Hill has been partly removed in recent years by excavation and use of the clay for the manufacture of brick. In the process of digging a fragment of some crude Indian object is sometimes unearthed. Another spot associated with the Paducahs is what is known as Graveyard Hill, a ridge 300 feet long situated a hundred yards S. E. of the Franklin school building on S.6th. St. The seasonal rains have almost leveled the 14 mounds that formerly rested on Graveyard Hill, and a lumber yard to the north of it has covered many signs and relics of the days when Chief Paduke was the wise sachem of his tribe. The arrowheads and flint rocks gathered there in years past would make an interesting collection. Several mounds were also located immediately back of the school under the trees. No legends are connected with the tribe beyond the naming of the city "Paducah" after "Chief Paduke", and this is now commonly accepted as authentic. One of the most prominent mounds in the county remains almost in its original shape, on the Wm. Rottgering property just beyond the city limits on the Cairo Road. Bibliography—Fred G. Neuman—"Paducahans in History" Paducah, Ky., 1922
History of West Paducah, Kentucky

The Community now known as West Paducah, Kentucky was originally known as Wilmington, Kentucky which was the county seat of McCracken County, Kentucky, from January 1827 through December 1832. The Community received their mail through Wilmington, Kentucky.

December 10, 1831 the General Assembly passed an act formally shifting the County Seat and mail service to Paducah, Kentucky.

Around 1851 Mr. Morris Maxon established a large flour mill on Massac Creek at the junction of the Cairo and the Metropolis Roads, about seven miles from Paducah. At the time the nearest mail service was at Paducah. Mr. Maxon acceded to a request of his customers that he accommodate them and other neighbors by receiving mail at his mill. He provided a mail box and all mail for the locality was then addressed to Maxon's Mill, which was established as a government post office.

In the early days the mail was brought from Paducah by horse-back.

Mr. Maxon died in 1903 and the mill was purchased by Mr. Adam Temple and Son and at that time they changed the name to Maxen dropping the word Mill, since a little village sprang up and they built the post office in the little village calling it Maxen Kentucky.

On January 16, 1925 the name of the post office was changed again this time to West Paducah, Kentucky a name which the office still bears.
