The Maysville Eagle has been informed by Lieutenant-Colonel Maltby that its statement that Colonel DeCourcey returned to Mt. Sterling with the whole Federal force on the day after the fight at Triplett Bridge was incorrect. The Eighth Michigan Cavalry remained and scoured the woods in the vicinity during the day following. Their horses were in no condition to longer continue the pursuit. Lieutenant-Colonel Maltby attaches no blame to De Courcey for having fired on the Tenth Kentucky, as by previous arrangement the Tenth was to have been at Morehead, but had altered their march on account of the route taken by the rebels being different from what had been expected. The fire of the artillery was directed by a Mr. Adams, who had been recommended to Colonel DeCourcey as being perfectly conversant with the country.
