

BOONE LOGAN

Boone Logan, of Pineville, who is dead at his winter home in Florida, mortgaged his property in Rowan county to buy 100 repeating rifles and arm his friends to wipe out the Craig Tolliver "gang" in Morehead. A cordon of men was thrown around the town. The Chesapeake & Ohio trains were flagged outside of the town, that there might be no interruption of the battle, and the wiping out of the Tollivers, desperate outlaws with every crime to their discredit, was done with thoroughness which bespoke the vigorous mind and hand of a fearless leader.

At the end of the battle the Tollivers were laid in a row upon the platform of the Chesapeake & Ohio station as an exhibit in proof of the success of the project which Mr. Logan and his friends undertook when the law had confessed its failure, and when, it was believed, the Governor of Kentucky had winked when Mr. Logan visited the executive office, outlined his plan and was told that "the law must be obeyed."

Brete Harte would have found in the personality of the late Mr. Logan a theme in which he would have delighted. He was a quiet, modest man, a gentleman in appearance, in demeanor, in fact. He was courteous in his social relationships, capable in the practice of his profession, devoted to peace and quiet. He did more, between early forenoon and late afternoon, to inaugurate peace and quiet in Morehead than the efforts of courts had accomplished in a generation. His was reform through militancy, but it was thoroughgoing reform. Unlike many uplifters less successful in the attainment of desirable objects, he was not inclined to boast.—Louisville (Ky.)
