Biographical / Historical Information: Roger William Barbour, born April 5, 1919, was a college professor, naturalist and zoologist from Morehead, Kentucky. He graduated from Morehead State Teachers College (presently Morehead State University) in 1938 with a bachelor's degree in biology before completing a master's degree at Cornell University in 1939. After graduation, Barbour began his teaching career at Morehead State. He later taught at Western Kentucky State Teachers College (presently Western Kentucky State University) and at the University of Kentucky in the Zoology Department from 1950 to 1984. He is best known for his photographic work and research on various types of animals including fish, reptiles, amphibians and mammals along with several series on plant life native to the State of Kentucky. Barbour was also known for his historic photographs of Morehead and Rowan County. He wrote and co-wrote several books which chronicle nearly every aspect of natural life in Kentucky. Barbour died on August 26, 1993.

Scope and Content: Collection consists of photographs, slides, and negatives depicting numerous species of animal life, flora and fauna found in Eastern Kentucky as well as historic images of Morehead and Rowan County, Kentucky acquired by Roger W. Barbour from the 1930s to the 1990s. Some of the photographs include accompanying information related to the animals pictured such as distribution patterns and paw print sketches. A series of photocopied articles from newspapers, magazines and journals, and chapters from books that feature the history of Eastern Kentucky and rural Appalachia used in his research was added to the collection. Also present are manuscripts of Barbour's publications as well as a series of correspondence. Personal artifacts from Barbour such as statuettes and small field equipment are included as well.
